1.0 INTRODUCTION

A personal website, or "blog," is a collection of online pages that a person publishes about themselves. It can be about anything, such as hobbies, pets, or other interests. There are several advantages to building a personal website, including job applications, competitive advantage, creative flexibility, and the opportunity to learn new skills.

Because we live in the digital era, having a personal website might help you gain more employment. Although most recruiters maintain a resume database, this does not imply that these submissions are the only factor they evaluate when looking for the appropriate individual. They also utilise Google to their advantage while looking for top-tier talent. This implies they may come across you and your personal professional website. As a result, having a strong website might considerably improve your prospects.

Furthermore, it can provide various competitive advantages in the workplace over other job hopefuls. This might include having a more full resume in an online style that is more user friendly and engaging, entices more people to visit your website, and so on. It may also serve as a one-stop shop for most recruiters, since it has your email address, phone number, social media handles, and in-built mail services.

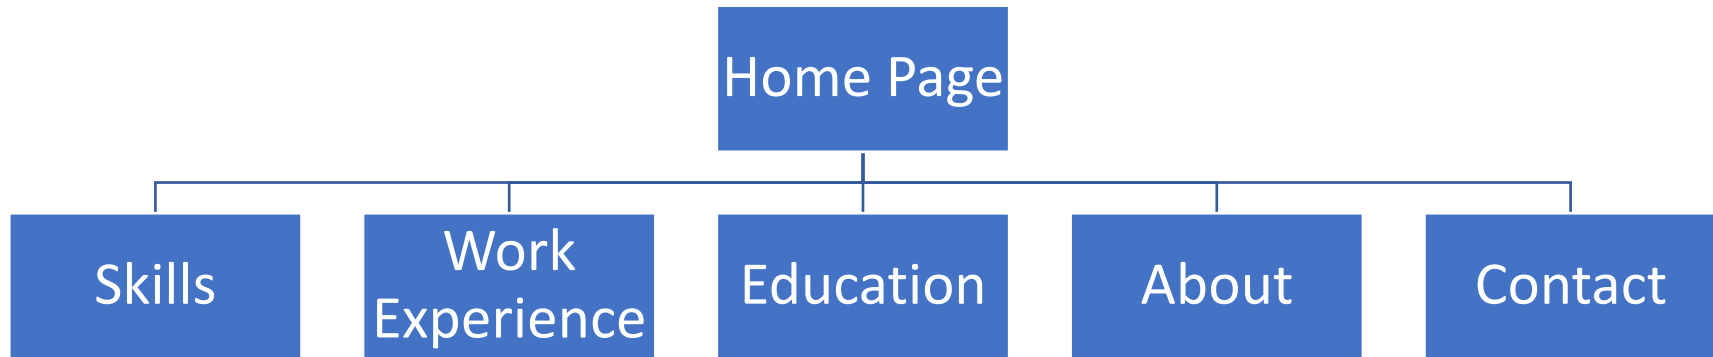

The next step is to have creative freedom. Instead of being limited to an A4 sheet of paper, having a website allows us to be more creative with the contents and what we put in it. We may incorporate graphics, videos, and links, all of which can assist increase the website's attractiveness and creativity.

Finally, creating a website needs a certain level of expertise. Those who are new to coding may find it difficult to comprehend concepts such as html and CSS, but with time, they will be able to gain the necessary abilities and will be able to use them later in their careers. Aside from that, once a website is established. Maintaining it is difficult because once your contact information is public, you must be able to control your internet profile more than you ever have before.

3.0 CONCLUSION

Lastly, through making my personal website, I have gotten a thorough grasp of the coding process and how to organise information. Creating the website was a difficult process because I had little to no knowledge with the area, demanding more study on how to approach the task in depth. This assignment has enabled me to be able to utilise the abilities I've learned to construct another website or improve on the present one, which will assist me in any other employment I may seek in the near future.
